Uma blockchain pública registra cada transação de forma permanente e torna o registro acessível a qualquer pessoa. Uma lei de proteção de dados exige que as organizações coletem dados pessoais apenas para finalidades informadas, os mantenham exatos, não os conservem por mais tempo que o necessário, os corrijam a pedido e os protejam contra acesso não autorizado. A tensão entre as duas coisas é evidente. A autoridade reguladora de Singapura enfrentou a questão diretamente. Este capítulo expõe o Personal Data Protection Act 2012 (a lei de proteção de dados pessoais de Singapura) tal como se aplica a empresas de ativos digitais e a posição sobre endereços de carteira como dados pessoais. Em seguida, trata das regras sobre transferências internacionais que regem um grupo Suíça–Singapura, da camada adicional do Cybersecurity Act 2018 e do conflito entre os deveres de privacidade e os deveres de prevenção à lavagem de dinheiro descritos na Parte L.
